Healthy, Creative Ideas for Fundraising

Each year schools around the country create plans for fundraising endeavors; often times these efforts are coordinated by parents and Parent Teacher Associations (PTAs) or Organizations (PTOs). Candy, cookie dough, chocolate, and soft drink sales provide money for a variety of necessary school improvements and scholarships. Schools use these funds to purchase playground equipment, classroom materials such as updated globes and maps, subsidize costly field trips, and many more important items. Switching gears from traditional candy sales to healthier products can be a difficult decision to make, given the perceived success and profitability of longstanding fundraising efforts. Still, it is important to at least try.

Why not sell candy if it raises money?

- Purchasing candy and cookie dough, as well as other foods or beverages of limited nutritional quality, promotes poor dietary habits for those who purchase and consume these items.
- School fundraising efforts should support the well-being of children and their loved ones.
- Parents, family members and friends may want to support fundraising efforts and feel obligated to buy them, but may feel uncomfortable about the options.
- There are numerous alternatives that not only promote health, but also raise money for schools.

You can support healthy eating for the whole family through the sale of foods that are low in fat, sugar and sodium such as:

- Bottled water
- Fresh fruit (fresh citrus is especially popular in the winter months)
- Popcorn
- Low-fat cereal bars
- Pretzels
- Individual (aseptic) milk boxes
- Whole grain baking mixes
- High fiber, low sodium soup mixes

Raising Funds without Food

In many school divisions in Virginia, Local School Wellness Policies encourage schools and their PTAs/PTOs to think creatively about fundraising efforts. Some schools have gone so far as to ban the sale of any food item, regardless of health value. What options exist for those schools looking for alternatives to food sales?
